Disruptive encounters: A call for “messy” research

Saturday 13 August, Terrace Room

‘Doing research’ is often a process that leaves more questions uncovered than answered. This year’s conference calls for we as researchers to embrace the times, places and knowledges that are entangled in our work, resist the pull towards easy answers, and consider how ‘messy’ research can tell interesting stories about the phenomenon in question.

The conference and lecture are both free of charge. Research Higher Degree students in Education and associated areas from UQ and other Higher Education Institutions are welcome to participate.

Keynote address -

Saturday 13 August, presented by Professor Catherine Manathunga, Victoria University

Professor Catherine Manathunga works in the College of Education at Victoria University and is a historian who draws together expertise in historical, sociological and cultural studies research to bring an innovative perspective to educational research, particularly focusing on the higher education sector.

Catherine has current research projects on doctoral supervision pedagogy, doctoral education and the history of university teaching and learning in Australia and Aotearoa/New Zealand.
